Sara is a Learning Program Manager at Google where she is responsible for guiding the development of learning applications that help professionals build skills that grow their careers. Prior to moving to the tech sector, Sara worked at UC Santa Cruz on a program that helped high school students in underserved communities earn the credits they need to graduate. In both of those roles, Sara greatest satisfaction was in helping students grow their careers and their potential through access to education. Sara holds a Masters of Information and Library Science from San Jose State University.

As a parent and as someone who attended college as a non-traditional student, I understand some of the challenges students face in achieving their degrees, and am passionate about providing access to education to all communities so that they can achieve their dreams. Cabrillo College serves a diverse population, and I'm committed to ensuring that all students are supported.
